Discuss the reasons behind the rise of fascist groups and acts in today's society.

Fascism is a common term spoken all around the world. However, this type of term may differ because of some situation. Fascism might be mentioned when a nation or race is held superior by people or government in the country. This sublimation behavior causes rise of fascist groups and acts in the world. After all, when looking at the todays' societies, it might be said that fascism that becomes problem in terms of economic, social or political, is spreading rapidly. These problems are discussed with two main cases. Governmental policies and the impacts of the media are seen as the reason for the rise of fascist thoughts in today's society.

Fascism with Government Policies

The case for rise of fascist groups and acts with government policies might be seen extreme nationalism become clearer. The countries that dominated feelings of nationalism, fascist movements are increasing. When looking at the pressures on black people in America, black people are under the pressure because of their race, it might be said that fascist groups and acts have increased. Michnik and Matynia (1991) explain that nationalism is a degenerate form, after all, of a natural need to live with national dignity and in an independent national state, since nationalism amounts to intolerance: it allows the rejection of another person because of his otherness (p. 759). It might be said that nationalism is essential case to live in a country, but these nationalist feelings should not harm someone else, because this harm causes the creation of fascist feelings after. A good example for rise of fascism and their acts with government policies is economic policy. All around the world, states work hard to facilitate the lives of people living in their countries. These works might be caused conflict between the states and people living these countries. It might be said that fascist acts and groups arise due to these conflicts.

Jacoby (2011) reports following:

> State crises and resultant challenges from the fascist right should be analyzed in terms of four overlapping networks of social power. The first – economic power relations- derives, he suggest, > from the human need to extract, transform, distribute and consume the resources of nature… Economic institutions and social classes arising out of production and market relations, cooperating yet simultaneously conflicting with one another (cited from Mann M. 2004). (p.909)

Fascist groups and acts might be increased because of the fact that state harms the nature to generate economic income. However, this policy causes conflict between government and communities living countries. In this context, government policies cause the rise of fascist groups and acts in todays' society. In countries, fascism is increasing rapidly due to the wrong politic steps.

Fascism with Impact of Media

The next critical area for rise of fascist groups and acts is censorship of media because of the fact that people might be affected by media. In todays', governments or people can apply certain pressures in order to continue the political or vital activities in media. These type of pressures might reveal fascist feelings. Moffett (1990) argues that since these groups lobby officials in democratic fashion to legislate their will, government does again become party to censorship. But it no longer instigates it, as monarchies and totalitarian regimes do, to protect the government itself (p. 5). It might be said that censorship is applied to impose thoughts on other people or institutions. This censorship causes increase of fascist groups and acts in todays' world, because the censorship of the media means that people are forced to impose their own ideas. Social media might be critical view for rise of fascist groups and acts. Fascist ideas become widespread with the effect of social media on people due to the fact that people having ideas of extreme nationalism might pressure on other people to impose their opinions with social media. After uncontrollable social media, internet control like censorship is requested. Warf (2011) comments following:

> There are multiple motivations for internet censorship, and thus several forms and types, including political repression of dissidents, human rights activist, or comments insulting to state in China, Iran, Burma/Myanmar; religious controls to inhibit the dissemination of ideas deemed heretical or sacrilegious as found in many Arab states. (p. 3-4)

Interventions on peoples' religions, political views and lifestyles on social media show that fascist thinking has become widespread. Therefore, internet censorship might be used for social media to avoid fascist ideas. Warf (2011) explain that the degree and type of Internet censorship obviously varies widely and reflects how democratic and open to criticism different political systems are (p. 5). It might be said that the dominant fascist thought has more influence on the social media. These statement which is impacts of media specify that the influence of the media on the rise of fascist groups and acts is not underestimated. However, the events in the media and the sharing in social media trigger fascist thinking.

Conclusion

The fundamental reason behind the fascist groups and acts is that people having extreme nationalism feelings. This type of people always harms other people that are around them with social media or dialogue. Since, this type of people makes insulting or sharing ideas that are challenging. Then, this case triggers the conflict between people. However, some governments cause rise of fascist groups and acts because of the wrong policies they developed. The works of government can cause different opinions among people. Then, the state or people who live in there might be called fascist. When looking at these cases, fascist groups are increased rapidly in todays' societies.
